In 1886, Quest enrolled at Yale University. He studied natural history and zoology, and he quickly became one of the top students in his class. He also joined the Yale Natural History Club, and he participated in several expeditions to collect specimens for the university's museum.

After graduating from Yale in 1890, Quest worked for a brief time as a curator at the American Museum of Natural History in New York City. However, he soon decided that he wanted to spend his life exploring the wilderness. In 1893, he joined the U.S. Geological Survey, and he began leading expeditions into the uncharted wilderness of the American West.

Quest's expeditions were often dangerous and difficult. He and his team faced extreme weather conditions, rugged terrain, and dangerous animals. However, Quest was always undeterred. He was driven by a passion to explore the unknown and to learn more about the wildlife of the West.

On one of his expeditions, Quest discovered a new species of bird. He named it the "Quest's sparrow." He also discovered several new species of mammals, including the "Quest's mouse." Quest's discoveries helped to increase our knowledge of the American West and its wildlife.

In addition to his work as an explorer, Quest was also a dedicated conservationist. He played a key role in the establishment of several national parks and wildlife refuges. He was also a strong advocate for the protection of endangered species.

Quest's work had a significant impact on the conservation of the American West. He helped to protect millions of acres of wilderness and wildlife habitat. He also inspired a generation of conservationists to continue his work.

George Grant Quest died in 1951 at the age of 83. He is remembered as one of the greatest naturalists, explorers, and conservationists of his time.
