

Saving Democracy From The Managerial Elite

Democracy is under threat from the managerial elite. This elite, composed of unelected bureaucrats and corporate executives, has increasingly concentrated power in its own hands, undermining the democratic process.

This article examines the threats posed by the managerial elite and proposes solutions to protect democracy.

The managerial elite has emerged as a dominant force in society over the past few decades. This is due to a number of factors, including:

- The growth of the bureaucratic state
- The increasing power of corporations
- The decline of traditional sources of authority, such as religion and the military

The managerial elite is composed of individuals who have received advanced degrees in business or public administration. They typically work in high-level positions in government, business, and non-profit organizations.

The managerial elite is not accountable to the public. They are not elected and they do not have to answer to voters. This gives them a great deal of power, which they can use to advance their own interests.

The managerial elite poses a number of threats to democracy, including:

- They are not accountable to the public. As mentioned above, the managerial elite is not elected and they do not have to answer to voters. This gives them a great deal of power, which they can use to advance their own interests.
- They are not representative of the public. The managerial elite is composed of a small number of individuals who are highly educated and wealthy. They do not represent the diversity of the population, and their interests are often at odds with the interests of the majority of people.
- They are insulated from the consequences of their decisions. The managerial elite lives in a bubble, surrounded by other elites. They are not exposed to the same risks and challenges as the rest of the population. This makes them less likely to understand the needs of the people they are supposed to serve.
- They are beholden to special interests. The managerial elite relies on corporate donations and grants to fund their activities. This makes them beholden to special interests, which can influence their decisions.

There are a number of solutions that can be implemented to protect democracy from the managerial elite, including:

- Increase public participation in decision-making. The best way to counter the power of the managerial elite is to increase public participation in decision-making. This can be done through a variety of means, such as:
 - Holding public hearings on important issues
 - Allowing citizens to vote on initiatives
 - Creating citizen advisory boards
- Elect more progressive candidates. Progressive candidates are more likely to be responsive to the needs of the people and to challenge the power of the managerial elite.
- Support organizations that challenge the managerial elite. There are a number of organizations that are working to challenge the power of the managerial elite. These organizations need our support.
- Educate the public about the threats posed by the managerial elite. It is important to educate the public about the threats posed by the managerial elite. This can be done through a variety of means, such as:
 - Writing articles and books
 - Giving speeches
 - Organizing protests

Democracy is under threat from the managerial elite. However, there are a number of solutions that can be implemented to protect democracy. By increasing public participation in decision-making, electing more progressive candidates, supporting organizations that challenge the managerial elite, and educating the public about the threats posed by the managerial elite, we can save democracy.
