The memoir begins with the sudden and unexpected death of Staples' beloved husband, David. Devastated by grief, she finds herself lost in a world that has been forever changed. As she grapples with her loss, she seeks solace in the memories of their shared life, the beauty of the natural world, and the love of her family and friends.

Through her journey, Staples explores the complex and often contradictory emotions that accompany loss. She writes candidly about the pain of heartbreak, the anger of betrayal, and the longing for what will never be. Yet, amidst her grief, she also finds glimmers of hope and resilience. She discovers strength in her own vulnerability, inspiration in the stories of others, and healing in the act of writing.

As Staples immerses herself in the natural world, she finds solace and connection in the rhythms of the seasons, the songs of birds, and the flow of rivers. She draws parallels between her own experiences and the cycles of life and death in the natural world, finding comfort in the knowledge that even in times of great loss, there is always the promise of renewal.

Throughout the book, Staples interweaves personal anecdotes with historical research, exploring the ways in which loss has been experienced and understood throughout time. She draws upon the writings of poets, philosophers, and theologians, finding solace and wisdom in their words. She also delves into the history of her own family, tracing the threads of loss and resilience that have shaped her lineage.
