The murders were committed by a group of teenagers, led by 16-year-old Ricky Hamby. Hamby and his friends were all from poor families, and they had grown up in a world of violence and despair. They saw the murders as a way to escape their poverty and to make a name for themselves.

The investigation into the murders was led by Kentucky State Police Detective John Shirley. Shirley was a veteran detective with a reputation for being tough and relentless. He was determined to find the killers and bring them to justice.

Shirley's investigation quickly led him to Hamby and his friends. He arrested them and charged them with the murders. The trial was a media circus, and the community was divided over whether or not the teenagers were guilty.

In the end, Hamby and his friends were convicted of the murders. They were sentenced to life in prison without the possibility of parole.
