Edward VIII: The Abdicating King

Edward VIII was the eldest son of George V and Queen Mary. He became king in 1936, but abdicated less than a year later in order to marry American divorcee Wallis Simpson. His abdication caused a constitutional crisis and was a major scandal at the time.

According to John Van Der Kiste, Edward VIII was "a complex and contradictory figure". He was charming and popular, but also headstrong and impulsive. His relationship with Wallis Simpson was doomed from the start, as she was not considered suitable to be queen.

George VI: The Reluctant King

George VI was the second son of George V and Queen Mary. He became king in 1936 after the abdication of his brother Edward VIII. He was a shy and unassuming man, but he proved to be a capable and popular king during World War II.

Van Der Kiste describes George VI as "a man of great courage and determination". He was not born to be king, but he rose to the occasion and led his country through one of its darkest periods.

Princess Mary, Countess of Harewood

Princess Mary was the only daughter of George V and Queen Mary. She married Viscount Lascelles in 1922 and became Countess of Harewood. She was a popular and active member of the royal family, and she was known for her work with charities.

According to Van Der Kiste, Princess Mary was "a kind and compassionate woman". She was also a gifted artist and musician. She was a devoted mother and grandmother, and she was loved by her family and friends.

Prince Henry, Duke of Gloucester

Prince Henry was the third son of George V and Queen Mary. He married Lady Alice Montagu-Douglas-Scott in 1935 and became Duke of Gloucester. He served as Governor-General of Australia from 1945 to 1947.

Van Der Kiste describes Prince Henry as "a quiet and unassuming man". He was a devoted husband and father, and he was popular with the Australian people during his time as Governor-General.

Prince George, Duke of Kent

Prince George was the fourth son of George V and Queen Mary. He married Princess Marina of Greece and Denmark in 1934 and became Duke of Kent. He was a popular and active member of the royal family, and he was known for his work with the Royal Air Force.

According to Van Der Kiste, Prince George was "a charming and charismatic man". He was also a gifted pilot and sportsman. He was a devoted husband and father, and he was loved by his family and friends.

Prince John

Prince John was the youngest son of George V and Queen Mary. He was born with epilepsy and learning difficulties, and he spent much of his life in institutions. He died in 1919 at the age of 13.

Van Der Kiste describes Prince John as "a tragic figure". He was a kind and gentle boy, but he was unable to live a normal life due to his disabilities. His death was a great sadness to his family and friends.
