The Sculpture

The Embrace is a 20-foot-tall bronze sculpture that depicts Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. and Coretta Scott King embracing. The sculpture is located on the Boston Common, a public park in the heart of Boston.

Criticism of the Sculpture

Some critics have argued that the sculpture is not an accurate depiction of the Kings. They point out that the sculpture depicts the Kings embracing in a way that is not consistent with the way they actually embraced in real life.

Other critics have argued that the sculpture is not appropriate for the Boston Common. They point out that the Common is a public park that is used by people of all ages and backgrounds. They argue that the sculpture is too controversial and that it does not belong in a place where people should be able to relax and enjoy themselves.

Supporters of the sculpture also argue that it is an appropriate addition to the Boston Common. They point out that the Common is a place where people of all ages and backgrounds come together to celebrate and enjoy themselves. They argue that the sculpture is a reminder of the importance of love, unity, and peace.
